Indian ornament has the typical Mohammedan division of spaces, but is more flowing and graceful than the pure Arabian style. These divisions are filled with fine conventional floral forms, such as the lotus, the date or horn, the iris, the rosette, and the pine. This pine is treated occasionally as a single flower, but more frequently as a cluster of flowers, which still retains the distinctive form of the pine (figs. 2, 4, and 6). Typical also of this period is the judicious treatment of the elephant, lion, tiger, peacock, and the human figure, as accessories in the decorative arts of India. They were applied with rare knowledge and skill, combined with an artistic perception of applied art, and show a very strong affinity with contemporary Persian ornament. Indian ornament has a more conventional rendering of natural forms than...
